

1. Yes, there should be a minimum age for criminal responsibility, my opinion would be that 10 years would be a good thing, because with the help of their parents they should learn what is not good to do and the consequences of these acts.
2. Justice and rehabilitation can be balanced through age-appropriate sanctions, combined with psychological support, education and social reintegration programs. Punishments should be proportionate to the seriousness of the offense while also providing an opportunity to correct their behavior.
3. From my point of view, it is ethical as long as it was not done by mistake, if it was intentional, as long as he was able to think about it, or plan how to kill, he can also conclude that it is not right and he should be held accountable for his actions.
4. Society must be protected from serious crimes and at the same time care must be taken not to violate the rights of minors, so measures must be applied to ensure public safety.
5. Psychological and social factors should play an essential role, as the behavior of minors is often influenced by the family environment, entourage or emotional disorders. These factors must be carefully analyzed before determining a punishment.

Minors should be treated as adults in certain situations in the legal system. To what extent do you agree?

I largely agree that minors should be held criminally accountable for the serious acts they commit, especially when they involve extreme violence. Although children and adolescents do not have a full level of maturity, some of them are capable of understanding the difference between right and wrong and the consequences of their actions. In such cases, the lack of clear criminal liability can send the wrong message and undermine society's trust in the justice system.

The application of criminal liability plays an important role in protecting public safety and deterring violent behavior. Victims and their families have the right to justice, regardless of the age of the aggressor. At the same time, sanctions can contribute to making minors responsible and aware of the seriousness of the acts committed.

However, the criminal liability of minors should not be identical to that applied to adults. It is essential that punishments are adapted to age and psychological development, being combined with rehabilitation, counseling and education programs. In this way, a balance can be achieved between punishment, prevention and a real chance of social reintegration.
